The author's testimony of his growing up years, the dysfunctional family where food and his mother were the arbiters of all things, these two volumes will try and tell his story. How he survived those early years, the cloistered life that could only be upended, the young adult locked in a struggle with his mother that could have no good ending, this will be his true story though it reads like fiction. I have tried to be as upbeat as possible in the telling. Still, it is an arduous journey, one that never finds any rest until it does.

Whether a person changes with time or merely ages is the question this book quite by accident discovers along the way. On the surface, the answer would appear to be yes, luck and circumstance taking an almost ethereal turn as our young protagonist arrives at the most unexpected of places, one that never could have been predicted. Still the question is never quite resolved. How far and away must one fly to escape themselves? And even if you do, can it be more than momentary? Or is life just the keep on running until you outrun yourself, can only look back to once upon a time and wonder why you didn't stop somewhere along the way? I don't know that answer. I'll let you be the judge. Everybody has a story. Here is his.
