Cage Thorn ran all the way down the street, panting deeply and frowning at the ridiculous amount of effort it was taking him to escape his enemies. They hated him because he was queer, but he was pretty sure that one of them had asked him for head at the club the other night while he had simply been trying to go to the bathroom. He frowned deeply and kept running, ducking into an alley way and hopping a fence to get back to his own apartment building. They were such idiots, he thought to himself. Nobody ever seemed to give him a break, and that was all right but it was still a pretty bullshit way to go for a lifestyle.

It's not like he could choose who he was, he thought to himself, grumbling profanities as he fumbled with his keys and let himself into his apartment. What he really needed to do was move to another part of the city, or another city entirely, where nobody would know who he was or give him any kind of crap for just living his life exactly how he wanted to and just being the person that he had always been deep down. Everyone else could just fuck off, as far as he was concerned. Nobody had the right to tell him to change. Everyone got a second chance to be better than they were before, and if those guys weren't improving themselves and just thought it made them tough as shit to deny their own homo tendencies and gang up on perfectly kind and innocent people in their community, then to hell with them.

That was the last straw, he decided. He was going to move across the state and go back home to where he had grown up.
